ELECTION
2016CAN THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY RETAIN
ITS HOLD ON BLACK VOTERS?Decades of overwhelming support could be evaporating, as new generations of African Americans grapple with novel choices. By THEODORE R. JOHNSON, courtesy of theatlantic.com, posted SEP 7, 2015

In 1988, the late Ed Brown, then-executive director of the Voter Education Project, watched as the Democratic Party ignored blacks' growing displeasure with Massachusetts Governor and Democratic presidential nominee Michael Dukakis.

The party assumed blacks had little choice but to support Dukakis since the only alternative would be to defect and vote Republican—an option ostensibly more unattractive than an inattentive Dukakis campaign. The party was wrong: Black voter turnout rate plummeted by nearly 5 percent, the second largest decline for this bloc ever observed.

In the lead up to the 1992 presidential election, Brown admonished an overconfident Democratic Party for again taking the black vote for granted. Lest its short memory fuel undue overconfidence, he famously reminded the party, “The view is that blacks have nowhere else to go, but blacks always have somewhere to go—they can go fishing.”

And the intervening years have largely borne him out. African Americans overwhelmingly back Democratic candidates in presidential and congressional elections—averaging about 88 percent support since 1980. And polling from past elections has shown that blacks are more likely to stay home on Election Day than to switch their vote to Republican presidential candidates. The black electorate mostly votes for Democrats, or not at all. But that may finally be changing.

The most commonly cited explanation for this phenomenon is the “black utility heuristic,” a framework developed by University of Chicago professor Michael Dawson in 1994. More commonly referred to as linked fate, it's the sentiment among blacks that one's prospects are ultimately tied to the success of the race.

“Black voters prioritize the well-being of the group over their individual interests because history has shown them that ‘we are in this thing together.’”

In his seminal book Behind the Mule: Race and Class in African-American Politics, Dawson argues that because race has been the predominant factor in blacks' American experience, “it was much more efficient for them to use the status of the group, both relative and absolute, as a proxy for individual utility.” In more practical terms, black voters prioritize the well-being of the group over their individual interests, and consider what's best for the group as a whole because history has shown them that “we are in this thing together.”

The cohesiveness of young African Americans remains strong, and is the genesis of the increasing social-protest activity in response to issues like the Confederate battle flag in South Carolina and aggressive policing of black people nationwide.

Yet after several years of surging voter participation rates by black young adults, their turnout fell by nearly 7 percent in 2012.

Taken together, these may signal the erosion of linked fate's effect on political behavior, which would constitute a tectonic shift in how black voters are viewed.

A reliance on heuristics is not unique to African Americans. Nearly every voter employs them to some extent. Tracking every nuance in each statute and every action of each elected official is an enormous investment of time and effort, so Americans tend to rely on heuristics, or shortcuts, that ease their decision-making process.

What has set blacks apart is the magnitude and uniformity to which they utilized the racial heuristic in their political behavior, rising to a level not observed in any other voting bloc.

For that reason, linked fate is most evident when examining black voting behavior. The black electorate's decades-long, near-uniform support for the Democratic Party is an occurrence unparalleled by any other race, ethnicity, or gender demographic in the modern political landscape. As such, the most considered question about black voters in the opening overtures of the 2016 presidential election is whether they'll turn out to support Hillary Clinton or simply “go fishing.”

Any prediction that a significant chunk of the electorate will vote for the Republican presidential nominee is deemed
