Serena Williams Could Insist That Doctors Listen to Her. Most Black Women Can't!

We can't solve America's maternal-health problem without first acknowledging how racism harms black moms.

By Elizabeth Dawes Gay—Courtesy of thenation.com, posted January 18, 2018

Last week, the world got to learn a little bit more about pro-tennis player Serena Williams's experience giving birth to baby girl Alexis Olympia, through her interview with Vogue magazine.

That little bit is now shining a big spotlight on the American health-care system and the hurdles and dangers women face bringing life into the world.

Williams delivered Alexis Olympia by emergency C-section after the baby's heart rate declined.

All was well until the next day, when Williams felt short of breath. She immediately brought this to the attention of her care providers and requested a CT scan because of her history of pulmonary embolism—that is, blood clots in her lungs—but they thought her pain medication was making her confused.

Nonetheless, she was able to insist on a CT scan and get an accurate diagnosis and appropriate treatment.

Williams is an international superstar, a sports phenom, and is on track to set a new record for Grand Slam victories.

But for all her celebrity and status she is, still, a black woman in America. And as such her birthing experience can't be separated from the birthing experiences of so many black women in America, who are far likelier than white women to suffer serious complications or die as a result of childbirth.

When discussing Williams's maternal-health emergency, it's vital to address the role played by racism and racial discrimination—a requirement to sustainably address the United States' growing maternal-health problem.

Black women are nearly four times more likely to die from pregnancy and childbirth than white women, and are also more likely to experience a severe maternal morbidity such as a heart attack, hemorrhage, sepsis, or blood clots like Williams did, regardless of their level of education or income.

In fact, data from the New York City Department of Health show that black college-educated women were more likely than white women who hadn't completed high school to experience adverse maternal-health outcomes.

Knowledge and money aren't enough to save black women, because racism trumps all. Denying that fact, or failing to mention it when the opportunity presents itself, hinders meaningful progress on maternal health in the United States, where maternal mortality is rising, instead of declining as it is in the rest of the developed world. We won't go far in solving the American maternal-health problem without first acknowledging and then addressing how racism—both inside and outside the health-care setting—harms black moms.

Racial discrimination within the health-care setting is a modern problem built on the legacy of slavery, reproductive oppression, and control of medicine and black bodies. It's important to remember that the white medical establishment worked hard to eliminate black midwives through smear-messaging campaigns claiming they were “dirty” and by

“How many other Black women have died or nearly died because their providers refused to listen to them or because these women didn't have the power to insist?”

Nation contributor Dani McClain described for this magazine her experience dealing with this knowledge while pregnant with her daughter. She wrote, “You might think that I don't need to worry: I eat a healthy diet; I don't have high blood pressure or diabetes. I am not poor; I have private insurance and a master's degree. I started prenatal appointments at 10 weeks and haven't missed one. But I'm under no illusion that my class privilege will save me.”

Dani also shared that she stopped watching the news during her last trimester—the accounts of police violence against black bodies was just too much. She wasn't wrong in doing so. Research by Dr. Fleda Mask Jackson found a connection between perceived police violence and depressive symptoms among pregnant black women.

The risk of depressive symptoms was higher in those pregnant black women who also already had a male child. Yet much of the discourse from care providers and public-health professionals has neglected to explicitly name the role of racial discrimination and systemic oppression in black maternal outcomes.

California is considered a leader on maternal health because it has succeeded in reducing maternal mortality for all moms in the state, mostly through enhanced safety protocols that help hospitals manage emergencies during labor and delivery and provide higher-passing laws restricting their practice. Today racial discrimination in clinical care presents in a variety of ways.

Research has shown that implicit racial bias may cause doctors to spend less time with black patients and that black people receive less-effective care.

Doctors are also more likely to underestimate the pain of their black patients. And anecdotes of disrespect and mistreatment abound.

To those familiar with this history and research, the fact that Williams's doctors didn't initially take her calls for care seriously isn't surprising.

Williams knew her history with blood clots and knew what she was experiencing, but her providers weren't inclined to trust her. How many other black women have died or nearly died because their providers refused to listen to them or because these women didn't have the power to insist?

Beyond that, racism outside of the clinical setting is a much broader problem that influences health even before people can interact with the health-care system.

Black people experience chronic stress resulting from exposure to overt and covert racism and micro-aggression, which can range from something as basic as intentionally avoiding eye contact to the extreme of being harassed, abused, or killed by police.

And racist policies—like those dictating where our children go to school, whether we can vote, how clean the water in our communities needs to be, who patrols our neighborhoods, and on and on—create structural inequalities that disadvantage black people and set us up to fail.

The chronic stress arising from racial discrimination and racist policies targeting those both black and female takes a toll on the body and disrupts normal biological processes necessary for optimal health.

Decades of research has established a link between stress and health, specifically the negative health consequences of living while black in America, regardless of socioeconomic status.

Healthcare, Poverty, and Education are Closely Linked - How Do We Move Forward?

According to Dr. Charles (Chuck) Basch, author of Healthier Students Are Better Learners, health issues, which disproportionately plague low-income urban minority youth, play a major role in limiting students motivation and ability to learn.

It is estimated that 800 million people are spending at least 10 percent of their household budget on out-of-pocket health care expenses, and nearly 100 million people are being pushed into extreme poverty each year due to health care costs.

The United Nations Sustainable Development Goal 3 aims to achieve Universal Healthcare for all people by 2030.

According to Kara Hanson, Professor of Health System Economics at the London School of Hygiene & Tropical Medicine, there are two main challenges for healthcare in low and middle-income countries.

The first challenge is the "growing burden of non-communicable diseases."

Hansen says that "more than half of the disease burden in lower-middle income countries is due to non-communicable diseases, and even in the lowest income countries, non-communicable diseases are responsible for one-third of the disease burden."

"There are so many challenges confronting humanity that we need to be deploying capital differently," says Bonnie Chiu who argues that "impact investing is the key to funding universal access to healthcare." A Columbia University study found that in 2008, the average doctor in the US earned $186,582, while in Canada, a country with higher healthcare satisfaction, the average doctor earns $125,000. "Broadening taxation and reducing spending would be ideal ways to balance the books," says Jacob Navarette.

"A truly modern health system needs to focus on enabling choice within itself," notes James Kernochan.

County Executive Abele Promotes Mary Jo Meyers to Serve as Director of Health and Human Services

Meyers, a 33 year County employee, Will Continue County's Successful Efforts on Collaborative, Community-Based, Trauma-Informed Care

Milwaukee County Executive Chris Abele today announced that Mary Jo Meyers, a values-driven, nationally-recognized expert in the field of community-based mental health care, will be promoted to serve as director of Milwaukee County's Department of Health and Human Services.

Meyers, a 33 year Milwaukee County employee, has served as director of Children's Services and Wraparound Milwaukee in the Behavioral Health Division since July of 2015, where she has helped to oversee the launch and implementation of programs such as the County's Mobile Urgent Treatment Team and Trauma Response Team.

Wraparound Milwaukee is a nationally-recognized model of community-based, trauma-informed mental health care that Ms. Meyers helped to design and launch. This model has since been adopted by National Wraparound Initiative.

During her tenure working for Milwaukee County, Meyers has demonstrated a tireless commitment to building strong partnerships with patients and families, stakeholders in the community and in the justice system, and among leaders in all levels of government.

"From disability services to youth justice reform, and everything in between, Milwaukee County's Department of Health and Human Services is leading the charge to implement best practices that will empower safer, healthier lives in our community," County Executive Chris Abele said. "With her deep roots in the community, a strong network of partners, and the support of an effective and engaged workforce, Mary Jo Meyers has the right combination of dedication, integrity, and expertise to keep doing the right thing at DHHS."

"I'd also like to extend my thanks to Jeanne Dorff for her service as interim director of the department as we searched for a permanent director," Abele said.

"I'm thrilled at this opportunity to use my experience and my passion for continuous innovation to serve Milwaukee County in a new way," Mary Jo Meyers said. "We still face challenges to overcoming stigma about mental health care and truly delivering the comprehensive care that Milwaukee County families need and deserve, but we are meeting these challenges head-on every day and are making significant progress in becoming a national model for excellence in all that we do."

During her tenure as director of Children's Services and Wraparound Milwaukee, Ms. Meyers was recognized by the American Public Human Services Association for Outstanding Training Education and Leadership in 2016, and in 2017 received the Best Community-based Program for Youth Involved in the Juvenile Justice System Award from the Office of Wisconsin State Public Defenders. In 2009, Ms. Meyers was recognized with a Best Innovations Award from Harvard University and the Annie E. Casey Foundation.

As a nationally-recognized expert in family engagement and community-based care, Ms. Meyers will remain central to Milwaukee County's ongoing efforts to implement successful, evidence-based reforms to our youth justice system that will improve outcomes for kids and families, and make our communities safer.

Meyers' appointment to director of the Milwaukee County Department of Health and Human Services is made pursuant to Wisconsin Statute Sec. 59.17(2) and is subject to confirmation by the Milwaukee County Board of Supervisors.

Racism towards Black women in maternal health care

quality care. The maternal-mortality rate declined from 10.9 deaths per 100,000 live births in 2000 to 7.3 deaths per 100,000 live births in 2013.

Despite these gains, the maternal-mortality rate for black women in California is 26.4 deaths per 100,000 live births.

When Dr. Elliott Main, medical director of the California Maternal Quality Care Collaborative, was asked in a November 2017 interview about ongoing disparities in maternal health, he failed to explicitly mention racism or racial discrimination, focusing instead on differential treatment and resources at hospitals where black women give birth.

As a public-health professional, I have attended dozens of conferences, meetings, and briefings on maternal health.

I have often been disheartened to hear public-health leaders and researchers neglect to explicitly call out the role of racism on maternal health, even when asked about it directly.

Providers, researchers, and public-health professionals are more inclined to point to the high prevalence of chronic diseases such as high blood pressure and diabetes, and to the epidemic of obesity in the black community.

This places the onus for large-scale change on individuals rather than the systems that we know cause harm.

Neither does it acknowledge how racial oppression contributes to the overrepresentation of chronic disease and illness among black people.

To advance maternal health in the United States, we have to address our race problem, and that starts by naming it. We must acknowledge that racial discrimination affects black mothers, even those as celebrated as Serena Williams.

Over Monday, Williams acknowledged the outpouring of stories that followed her going public with her own, writing on Facebook, "I didn't expect that sharing our family's story of Olympia's birth and all of complications after giving birth would start such an outpouring of discussion from women—especially black women—who have faced similar complications and women whose problems go unaddressed."

She encouraged women to "continue to tell those stories. This helps. We can help others."

That's the first step, yes—but providers, researchers, and public-health experts also need to hear our stories and acknowledge the role of racism.

Public Notice for an Emergency Research Study of Cardiac Arrest
In Southeast Wisconsin

Researchers at the Medical College of Wisconsin are studying the best way to care for adults who have been successfully treated from out-of-hospital cardiac arrest.

This message is a public notice of a research study of adults successfully treated from out-of-hospital cardiac arrest, which is when a person's heart stops beating. The study will compare two standard hospital treatments for a person after successful treatment from out-of-hospital ventricular fibrillation cardiac arrest. (an irregular heart rhythm that does not pump blood). The goal of this research is to help more people live and reduce brain damage after cardiac arrest. The study will begin February, 2018 in Milwaukee County, Wisconsin.

What happens during cardiac arrest?

Cardiac arrest means that a person's heart stops beating. When this happens, blood does not reach important organs like the brain, lungs, or kidneys. This can injure these organs. Typically, emergency services start cardiopulmonary resuscitation (CPR) until the heartbeat is normal again. When the heartbeat is normal again, people are then taken to the hospital for further treatment. In the hospital, a person will either first go for a heart procedure or first go to the intensive care unit (ICU).

Why do we need to do this research?

Right now, researchers are not sure whether a person would be helped by a heart procedure (cardiac catheterization) or not. Adults with a known blockage in the artery of their heart quickly have a heart procedure (cardiac catheterization) to remove the blockage and restore blood flow to their heart. There is no good test in adults successfully treated from out-of-hospital ventricular fibrillation cardiac arrest and a normal ECG (heart wave test) to decide who is having a blockage and who is not. About half of people do have a blockage and about half do not. Right now, people with a normal ECG may or may not have the heart procedure. It is unknown which standard of care is better. This research study is comparing whether having the heart procedure or not is better for people with a normal ECG. People in this study will be randomly chosen to have one of these two standards of care. All people will receive one of these two standards of care for cardiac arrest. The researchers will find out if more people live or have less brain damage if they first receive the heart procedure or first go to the ICU.

Are there risks to this research?

All research contains potential risks. Anyone who has cardiac arrest and needs CPR has risks if they are in this study or not. The risks from cardiac arrest include damage to the brain, heart, or multiple organs, infections, seizures, another cardiac arrest, and death. Potential risks of the heart procedure (cardiac catheterization), include heart attack, stroke, injury to the artery used in the procedure, tear in the heart or heart artery, fluid or blood around the heart, bleeding requiring blood transfusion, kidney damage, and death. Less than 1 in 100 people having the heart procedure have one of these risks. There is a risk that a person having the heart procedure may not have a blockage in the heart arteries. There is also a risk if a person does not first go to have the heart procedure and they needed it. All people in both groups will receive one of these two standards of care. Every precaution will be taken to assure safety. All information obtained from this study will remain private and confidential. The findings from this study will be presented at meetings and published in scientific journals to be useful to others. Information that could identify a person will not be used.

What is the benefit of this research?

This study may help people in the study and other people in the future. There is potential that one of the standard treatments will increase a person's chance of living or reduce brain damage, but that benefit is not guaranteed. There are other benefits to both groups in the study. The potential benefits from a person first getting the heart procedure is potentially less heart damage or knowing that there is no blockage of the heart arteries. The potential benefits from not getting the procedure and first going to the ICU include stabilizing a person's breathing, blood pressure, and body temperature before having the heart procedure, if needed, at a later time.

Adults treated at Froedtert Hospital may be in this study.

Cardiac arrest is an emergency and the hospital staff have to act quickly to treat a person. Researchers will attempt to get informed consent when possible. However, there may be situations where there is no time to get permission. People with cardiac arrest are usually unconscious and cannot agree to join. In studies like this, a person's consent may not be possible. This is called an exception from informed consent under emergency circumstances. That means, if you do not want to be in this study, you must request that you not be included. You will be given a bracelet or necklace to wear that tells the hospital staff that you are not part of the study. You will still get standard treatment. The Office for Human Research Protections within the Department of Health and Human Services requires that researchers notify communities in cases when consent is not possible due to an emergency (Title 45, Section 46). Researchers will also let you know when the study is done.

Please contact us if you have questions about the risks and benefits of this study, exception from informed consent under emergency circumstances, or to get opt-out jewelry if you do not want to be in this study.

If you have questions or concerns about this study or you do not want to be in the study, contact Dr. Tom P. Aufderheide, either by phone (414-805-6493), mail (Department of Emergency Medicine, 9200 W. Wisconsin Ave., Froedtert Hospital East, PV1, Milwaukee, Wisconsin 53226, email (RRC@mcw.edu), or visit the website at www.mcw.edu/access. If you do not want to participate, you will receive jewelry (such as a bracelet or necklace) to wear for the hospital staff to know. If you have concerns, your feedback may be used to change the study.
