Banker develops app to help connect Black people with Black therapists

By Megan Sims, article courtesy of TheGrio.com

With mental health being such an important issue shrouded in stigma, a new app aims to bring much needed access to mental health services to the Black community.

Senegal native and former investment banker Eric Coly, 45, created Ayana after a close friend confided to him that she had been having a hard time finding a therapist, particularly a Black one, Fast Company reported.

“Take aside the stigmatization and the lack of access to insurance and resources, [minorities] tend to only find people whom they aren’t able to relate to quite well,” Coly, who also suffers from depression, said. “And they essentially give up.

They buy into the notion that there’s no one out there who can help them.”

According to Fast Company, of the 100,000 therapists in the U.S., 86% are white, 5% Hispanic, 5% Asian, and 4% African American, which has made it more difficult for Black people to find a therapist that looks like them. Many in the African American community have built a skepticism around the mental health industry that has been passed down through the generations. Recently, there has been an effort to change this stigma and Ayana intends to be evidence of this.

Ayana features a matchmaking algorithm based on several factors that include, gender, ethnicity, culture, class, language and more. Once a match is made, users can text and call therapists anonymously.

Noting that Black patients spend two-thirds of their counseling time to talk about issues regarding race, Coly said it was important that they did not feel like they had to teach the counselor about these issues.

“No one should have to go into a place where you are meant to discuss issues in your life and discuss race as an issue for most of the session,” Coly argued. “No one should have to educate a counselor.”

Though Coly noted finding practitioners has not been easy, as they have about 55, but said his goal is to find 100,000 by the end of 2020.

Ayana, which is also LGBTQ friendly, is set to launch on Apple and Android in early January. According to Fast Company, monthly packages start at $140 a month for two sessions and unlimited texting, a high price point for lower-income individuals, but Coly hopes to work on more affordable plans as well as subsidize cost by partnering with community-based organizations.

Trump really doesn't want to talk about his health care record!

Trump

The uninsured rate is rising, and he has nothing to say about it! By Matthew Yglesias

As its Christmas gift to America, President Donald Trump’s reelection campaign created a “Snowflake Victory” website that provides honest God-fearing Americans with the arguments they need to demolish any young leftist relatives they may encounter over the holidays.

The site is a series of video clips with accompanying text coaching you through various pro-Trump talking points about the strength of the American economy, the need for a wall, and how there was “no quid pro quo” with the Ukrainian government.

As is typical for Trump’s official communications, it relies pretty heavily on the strategy of saying things that aren’t true.

The environment section, for example, says “we have the cleanest air on record.” That would be great news if it were true, since recent studies indicate that air pollution is much more harmful than previously believed. The truth, however, is that people in the US are currently living through an unprecedented deterioration of air quality.

That’s only partially the fault of Trump’s deregulatory initiatives, but his team has a lot more deregulatory initiatives in the pipeline that will make things even worse.

The Snowflake Victory document does convey one critically important truth — Trump really does not want to talk about his record on health care. On most topics at hand, Trump’s team has something — whether true or not — to say in favor of the Trump administration’s policy initiatives.

But on health care, the argument is entirely negative — Democrats are bad; Medicare-for-all is bad.

And that makes sense, because when it comes to health care, Trump can’t really tout his priorities. Over the past three years, he has pursued policies that would reduce the number of people who have health insurance and the quality of the insurance enjoyed by the insured.

Trump’s argument on health care: Single-payer is bad

The “Snowflake Victory” site has a pretty simple talking point when it comes to touting President Trump’s health care record: Democrats are bad.

“Democrats like to squawk a lot about President Trump, Republicans, and healthcare, but the truth is, the 2020 Democrats are the ones who want to strip you of your private, employer-provided health insurance!” goes one talking point. The site talks about how Medicare-for-all requires tax increases, and argues that public option alternatives “are designed to kill employer-provided health plans too.”

It also serves up for the reader what it considers a killer line: “Ask your relative if they like going to the DMV? Now tell them to imagine the government controlling their healthcare system because that’s exactly what it would be like.”

Personally, it has not been my experience that filing reimbursement paperwork with Cigna is a notably superior customer service experience to what’s provided at the Department of Motor Vehicles.

And I suppose the snowflakes might turn this around and ask their older MAGA relatives if they feel Medicare is really so awful.

But the key thing is this discussion

Dr. Madelaine Tully Wins 2019 Health Care Hero Award

Milwaukee Native and Physician at Progressive Community Health Centers Honored for Commitment to Providing Access to Health Care for Underserved

Dr. Madelaine Tully, a family physician at Progressive Community Health Centers, has received a Health Care Hero Award from BizTimes Media. The annual Health Care Hero Awards salute the accomplishments of people and organizations making a positive difference on the front lines of health care in southeastern Wisconsin.

A Milwaukee native and graduate of Rufus King High School, Dr. Tully has dedicated her career to helping people who have fallen through the cracks of an often fragmented health care system. She began her medical tenure in private practice but became discouraged by the restrictions of what she could do to help those with limited or no health insurance.

In 2008 Dr. Tully made a career move to Progressive Community Health Centers, a Federally Qualified Health Center (FQHC) serving Milwaukee's northwest side. Progressive Community Health Centers operates four clinics and serves more than 16,000 low-income patients annually. No patient is ever denied care based on insurance status or ability to pay. In contrast, it's precisely those vulnerable populations that Progressive Community Health Centers aims to serve. Medicaid reimbursement represents nearly 70 percent of the agency's revenue, and uninsured patients pay for services on a sliding fee.

Progressive Community Health Centers' largely minority patient population is disproportionately impacted by health disparities. One in five patients has a diagnosed mental health condition and roughly a third suffer from chronic disease including diabetes and hypertension. Patients also face socioeconomic barriers such as lack of suitable housing, increased incidence of violence, and higher rates of unemployment.

Jenni Sevenich, CEO at Progressive Community Health Centers, commented that "these struggles can seem intimidating and even insurmountable to some health care providers. But Dr. Tully views these challenges as inspiration for positive change." Dr. Tully has spearheaded quality improvement initiatives focused on chronic disease management. This included launching a successful diabetes group visit model and introducing a fruit and vegetable prescription program in partnership with Fondy Food Center. She regularly vol-

CITY OF MILWAUKEE HEALTH DEPARTMENT

City of Milwaukee Health Department awarded $735,000 NACCHO grant to fight the opioid epidemic in Milwaukee County

The National Association of City County Health Officials (NACCHO) announced recently that the City of Milwaukee Health Department (MHD) has been awarded $735,000 to further the work of the Milwaukee Overdose Response Initiative (MORI).

MORI is a collaboration between MHD, the Milwaukee Fire Department (MFD), and other community partners to address challenges related to the opioid epidemic in Milwaukee County.

The overall goals of MORI include the following: decrease overdose fatalities, increase access to evidence based treatment, and decrease emergency department usage.

Trump really doesn't want to talk about his health care record!

would leave you with no idea that Trump is actually doing stuff on health insurance — stuff his reelection campaign can't really defend.

Trump's record on health insurance: more uninsured

To review the record here, the Trump administration spent months pushing a variety of Affordable Care Act repeal plans, each of which would have cost tens of millions of people their health insurance. None of those efforts succeeded, but it wasn't for lack of trying.

He has followed that up by pushing a variety of Medicaid waiver schemes to allow GOP-held states to restrict low-income families' access to health care.

His administration is particularly enthusiastic about work requirements that reduce coverage while doing nothing to encourage work. Work requirements in several states were put on hold by federal courts, but Trump is also remaking the federal judiciary and confirming sympathetic judges at a record pace. Consequently, he's likely to ultimately prevail in this effort to reduce coverage.

Speaking of the courts, the Trump administration is also vigorously pursuing a lawsuit that, if successful, would toss out the entire Affordable Care Act.

That would entail a much more dramatic reduction in Medicaid coverage, plus the loss of subsidies for millions of Americans who buy coverage on the exchanges, plus the removal of critical regulatory protections for everyone who gets job-based insurance.

"The Trump administration is vigorously pursuing a lawsuit that would toss out the entire Affordable Care Act. That would entail a dramatic reduction in Medicaid coverage, the loss of subsidies for millions of Americans who buy coverage on the exchanges, plus the removal of critical regulatory protections for everyone who gets job-based insurance."

GOP appointees on the Fifth Circuit Court seemed poised to give Trump what he wanted on this, then got cold feet just before Christmas. But they didn't rule in favor of upholding the Affordable Care Act. Instead, they came up with some procedural delays that may have been designed to not do anything politically explosive until after the election.

The result of all this is that the uninsured rate in America is actually rising even though the labor market is getting stronger — a clear sign that health care remains an important policy area that won't be fixed just by good generic economic conditions.

And it's a policy area where Trump is pursuing priorities — less insurance — that his own team has no defense for.

Religious coping's positive impact on older adults with depression

HOUSTON – People use different coping mechanisms to deal with depression, and many use religion to handle depressive symptoms.

Researchers at Baylor College of Medicine and the University of Texas at Austin studied the effects of religious coping and its correlation with the treatment of psychotherapeutic depression in older adults. Their findings were recently published in Aging and Mental Health.

“There are some in the religious community who place more of a negative stigma on mental illness and mental health treatment. We wanted to see whether somebody’s religious coping affected their willingness and satisfaction with therapy and whether it affected their outcome,” said Dr. Mark Kunik, professor of psychiatry research at Baylor.

Researchers studied 277 impoverished, homebound older adults with depression. Participants self-reported their religious coping mechanisms on a coping scale and were divided into three groups. Two of the groups received different types of depression treatment videos:

Behavioral therapy: a brief, structured therapy that aims to increase and reinforce healthy behavior, such as engaging in meaningful life activities aligned with personal values and beliefs.

Problem solving therapy: a brief, structured, cognitive-behavioral treatment that teaches patients problem-solving coping skills to help them deal with major negative life events, as well as daily problems that are making them depressed.

A third group of participants were part of the attention control group, which provided telephone call check-ins instead of video therapy.

According to Kunik, preliminary findings of the study showed religion’s positive effects on patients undergoing video therapy. Those that use religion to cope with depression, such as through prayer and meditation, experience better mental, physical and cognitive health.

The study also found that religious coping was more common among women and African-Americans.

These findings can inform homebound and other older adults who suffer from depression and are reluctant to seek psychotherapy as well as aging service providers who work with them.

Other contributors to this work include Namkee G. Choi, John E. Sullivan and C. Nathan Marti. This work was supported by the National Institute on Minority Health and Health Disparities (under grant 1R01MD009675; PI: N. Choi). St. David’s Foundation also provided supplemental grant.

Ed Aschoff's death: How often does pneumonia kill healthy adults?

"Anyone can get pneumonia, and it can be severe."

By Sara G. Miller, courtesy of NBCNews.com

The news that an ESPN reporter died on his 34th birthday after being treated for pneumonia is a reminder, experts said, of how deadly the infection can be, even in otherwise healthy young people.

ESPN said the reporter, Ed Aschoff, died on Tuesday after a brief illness, without elaborating on a cause of death. Aschoff tweeted on Dec. 5 that he had pneumonia.

While often thought of as an illness that affects the sick and the elderly, and while older adults, people with weakened immune systems and young children are more at risk, pneumonia can strike indiscriminately, said Dr. Humberto

Ed Aschoff's death: How often does pneumonia kill healthy adults?

Choi, a pulmonologist at Cleveland Clinic in Ohio. (Choi was not involved with Aschoff's case.)

"This is an example that anyone can get pneumonia, and it can be severe, even when that person is in good health," Choi told NBC News.

Pneumonia is an infection that causes inflammation in the air sacs of the lungs. These air sacs, called alveoli, can fill with fluid, making it difficult to breathe. The disease can be fatal, especially this time of year, when respiratory infections are more common, Choi said.

The flu, in particular, can increase a person's risk of developing pneumonia.

"This is why we talk so much about the flu shot," Choi said.

The flu can lead to pneumonia in several ways. The virus itself can cause viral pneumonia, but having the flu can also put a person at risk for bacterial pneumonia, which is considered more severe.

Some cases of viral pneumonia can clear up on their own, without treatment, said Dr. Natalie Azar, an assistant Aschoff professor of medicine and rheumatology at NYU Langone Medical Center in New York City and an NBC News medical contributor. Bacterial pneumonia, however, must be treated with antibiotics.

It's unclear if Aschoff had bacterial pneumonia, but he said in his Dec. 5 tweet that he was taking antibiotics.

Choi, who works in an intensive care unit, said that pneumonia is one of the leading causes of patients' needing intensive care. The inflammation can be overwhelming, he said, and patients may need oxygen and life support.

Not every case of pneumonia is severe, however, and many can be treated with outpatient care, Choi said.

"In an otherwise healthy young adult, barring anything unforeseen, treatment can be fairly straightforward and patients can recover within a few weeks," Azar said.

"It must be remembered, however, that pneumonia is serious and can be life-threatening in certain situations," she said. "In certain cases, the infection just overwhelms someone's immune system."

In the U.S., more than 250,000 people are hospitalized each year from pneumonia, and about 50,000 people die, according to the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention.
