Civil rights legend Andrew Young visits Milwaukee to support youth empowerment

A legendary figure in the civil rights movement visited Milwaukee to help kick off the annual Fellowship Open.

Ambassador Andrew Young — former mayor of Atlanta, American Ambassador to the United Nations, and close confidante of Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. — participated in the golf outing's 25th anniversary.

The Fellowship Open raises money for programs like MKE Fellows, which is dedicated to empowering young Black men.

"You're setting examples for other cities... as far as I know this is the only community that has an activist, charitable base," Young said.

At 93, Ambassador Young shared a powerful message during a fireside chat at Quarles and Brady.

"I think I've been through just about everything... and we now know how complicated life is on this planet," Young said.

A living symbol of courage and commitment, Ambassador Young reminded attendees that the work isn't over.

"We've never stopped working on how to resolve those problems, and you can't solve them if you don't try," Young said.

Trump Is Using Black And Brown Cities To...

...Build A New Plantation Economy For MAGA America

It's not about stopping crime. It's about baiting Black and Brown folks into rebellion so he can justify unleashing even more force, and quite frankly, justify killing us. Dr. Stacey Patton, article courtesy of newsone.com

New York.

Chicago.

Los Angeles.

Baltimore.

Washington, D.C.

One by one, their names crawl across the headlines like enemy targets in crosshairs.

These cities are majority Black- and Brown, Democratic-led with Black mayors, labeled by the right as "crime-ridden" urban hellscapes.

The headlines clang together in ominous rhythm: the Pentagon is quietly "planning" to put National Guard troops on the ground in Chicago. Trump is publicly threatening to withhold federal funds from Baltimore's collapsed Key Bridge while dangling the possibility of sending in troops. Meanwhile, rapid-fire detention deals in red states are ramping up to cage migrants faster. CNN has broadcast images of National Guard troops standing by for a crackdown in Chicago, even as D.C. is still reeling from a similar stunt. Trump promises that New York City and L.A. will follow next.

Each headline is a shard in the same mirror. These are cities that conservatives have spent decades branding as cesspools of crime and chaos whenever they need to scare white suburbs into voting red. Now they're the backdrop for an authoritarian flex Trump's been telegraphing for years. So, it's no surprise to see them lined up for a spectacle of punishment. This is not a coincidence or force, and quite frankly, justify killing us.

It's the authoritarian play-book in motion: manufacture a crisis, flood the stage with uniforms, wait for the backlash, unleash racialized terror, and then claim victory as the strongman who tamed the "urban jungle."

While he points cameras at "crime-ridden blue cities," he's quietly scaling capacity to cage people faster and longer. Deals are underway with Republican governors to spin up new or expanded migrant detention sites in places like Florida, Indiana, and Nebraska because red states are lining up to cash federal checks and deputize local cops under 287(g) to feed ICE. That's the factory floor of this crackdown, and it runs whether the street drama makes headlines or not.

That's the darker layer beneath the optics.

When Trump threatens D.C., Baltimore, Chicago, New York, or L.A. on camera, it's a spectacle for his base. But when you zoom out, you see the infrastructure quietly being built in red states: detention centers, deputized sheriffs, expanded contracts for pri-warehousing Black and Brown bodies.

This crackdown doubles as a jobs program for MAGA America. These are carceral industries as economic development. A modern plantation economy, with detention centers instead of farming fields. And that's the sinister genius of it: the people cheering the loudest for Trump's war on "crime" aren't just animated by racism, they're being promised a paycheck that depends on locking us up.

Meanwhile, in the very cities being targeted (Baltimore, Chicago, D.C., L.A., New York), this crackdown serves another purpose: speeding up gentrification. Flood a neighborhood with troops, slap on curfews, sweep migrants into cages, criminalize resistance, and you soften the ground for developers who want "safety" for their new condos and coffee shops. But developers aren't just bystanders. They're part of the authoritarian coalition. Black and Brown residents become disposable. They're either displaced or funneled into the same carceral system, feeding jobs to rural white communities.

And then there's the

a policy wonk's dreary strategy; it's a meticulously staged show of force. The choreography of authoritarian theater.

Trump is staging a dance of power meant to look like law and order but designed to provoke, humiliate, and dominate. He's rehearsing a spectacle where Black and Brown cities become the set pieces, the soldiers become the props, and the headlines become the script. It's not about stopping crime. It's about baiting Black and Brown folks into rebellion so he can justify unleashing even more private prison companies. This isn't just about law enforcement. It's an economic engine.

It mirrors the old prison boom of the 1980s and '90s, when rural white towns became dependent on prisons for jobs, contracts, and state funding. Now, Trump is rebooting the same carceral logic but dressing it up as "border security" and "urban crime control." Red states don't just get to wave the flag of law and order. They get the federal money, the construction contracts, the guard jobs, the economic lifeline that comes with meta-game: redraw the voting map while the sirens wail. Trump is openly pushing mid-decade gerrymandering, Texas first, to lock in House power before 2026, triggering a redistricting arms race that even Democrats now admit they'll answer in California and elsewhere. Deploy troops. Juice detention. Redraw the districts. This is a holistic approach to regime maintenance.

All these cities are perfect foils in the conservative imagination: Black and Brown, immigrant-heavy, blue-run, sanctuary-leaning,

Trump Is Using Black And Brown Cities To Build A New Plantation Economy For MAGA America

(continued from page 2) and allegedly “out of control.” Never mind that the data undercuts Trump’s narrative. Chicago officials cite double-digit drops in homicides, robberies, and shootings; D.C. violent crime hit a 30-year low last year. Facts don’t matter in fear politics. Optics do.

So what’s the real play? Provoke, then pounce. Bait Black and Brown neighborhoods into visible anger under curfews, with troops in the streets, ICE in workplaces and courts, and when people defend themselves, cite it as proof that the regime was right about cracking down on these communities. That justification then greenlights broader federalization of policing, fast-track deportations, mass arrests, and emergency powers. We’ve seen versions of this movie across the globe. The ending is always the same: obedience through exhaustion.

And the timing isn’t accidental. Epstein files are trickling toward Capitol Hill. Even the redacted scraps are a political risk because they cut across donor classes and media darlings. Trump is trying to bury the narrative under “crime crackdowns” and “border chaos,” wrapped in the flag, so he can hand his base an enemy they can see. Distract, dominate, redraw, detain. And when the headlines about Epstein trickle out, he’ll already have a bigger story queued up, one with soldiers and sirens.

Expect rolling pilot deployments marketed as success stories. Expect choreographed standoffs with big-city mayors. Expect a fog of conflicting statements from the Pentagon and White House to keep accountability slippery. Expect a rapid expansion of detention capacity far from the cameras while governors and sheriffs brag about “partnerships.”

Watch for federal pressure campaigns to flip or bypass governors in targeted states. Watch for more curfews and “security zones” in select urban corridors. Watch also for a steady drip of propaganda about “grateful residents,” especially Black mothers and elders begging for troops. The legal fights will lag behind the facts on the ground. By the time courts catch up, the map will be redrawn, and the jail beds already paid for.

The grand message from Trump to the MAGA base will be primal: I will make enemy cities kneel. I will humiliate blue mayors and Black governors. I will control the streets, the borders, the bodies, and the narrative. And when the midterms come, your team won’t just win, we’ll rig the rules legally and dare anyone to stop us. It’s dominance politics with a ballot-box kicker that sets the stage for decades of Republican rule.

So, let’s call the thing what it is: not a war on “crime,” but a provocation strategy aimed at producing the images Trump needs: helicopters over majority-Black neighborhoods, National Guard convoys through immigrant districts, protest clips cut to look like riots. Those pictures will become ads, those ads will become fear, and that fear will become votes while the detention contracts get signed, and the congressional maps get carved.

This is kaleidoscope white supremacist politics. Turn on the tube and you’ll see the same shards of racism, austerity, militarization, propaganda rearranged into a new pattern that always points to the same result:

more power for the right, less freedom for the rest of us. Put it all together, and the pattern is unmistakable. And every turn of that kaleidoscope rearranges the same shards into the same ugly picture: Black and Brown people in cages, white power in charge, and Trump smiling for the cameras.

So, what must we do to resist?

To resist what Trump is doing to Black and Brown cities, the response has to be as layered as the attack itself. Because this isn’t just about troops on the ground or scary headlines. It’s about an entire infrastructure of fear, carcerality, and receipts: the falling crime rates, the ignored white crime zones, and the fact that these cities are safer than the propaganda suggests. If the spectacle is the stage, truth must be the counter-theater.

Second, resistance has to call out the economics.

This isn’t just about “law and order,” it’s a jobs program for rural white America. Just like prisons in the ’80s and ’90s, detention centers and federal contracts are lifelines for towns hollowed out by capitalism. We need to name that this is a plantation reboot, where Black and Brown bodies are the raw material for white survival. Once you mutual aid, cultural counter-narratives. These are all the ways of saying “we will not kneel” without handing him the footage he craves.

Fourth, local power has to double down.

City councils, mayors, and grassroots organizations must document everything — the curfews, detentions, and abuses — and push cases into federal courts even if the wheels turn slow. Paper trails today become weapons tomorrow. Meanwhile, communities must tighten their own defense networks. Know-your-rights trainings, bail funds, protest safety infrastructure, and bring back a 21st-century version of the Black Panthers because the crackdown is designed to exhaust us into submission.

And finally, solidarity must be kaleidoscopic.

Trump is banking on divide-and-conquer: painting migrant detention as “their problem,” urban occupation as “their fault.” But it’s all one machine. If we silo ourselves, Black folks here, immigrants there, working-class back there, liberals in their lane, then we’re already halfway defeated.

The resistance has to be holistic, loud, unashamed, and united in saying: this is not about crime, it’s about control. And we won’t let him script our future as spectacle.

First, we have to strip the lie out of the narrative every time it appears.

The right thrives on optics: tanks in D.C., soldiers in Chicago, staged press conferences in front of broken bridges. Those images are designed to lock fear into people’s nervous systems and to normalize occupation as “protection.” Our work is to flood the conversation with the re-expose the money trail, you unmask the real motives and fracture the “public safety” excuse.

Third, we have to refuse the bait.

Trump’s strategy hinges on provoking uprisings he can film, then branding them as riots to justify even more force. That doesn’t mean staying silent; it means shifting tactics. Creative resistance, economic disruption, legal warfare,

Why So Many Black Women Suffered Economic Loss in Anti-DEI Purge

Overworked and underpaid, they were the most vulnerable

By Dr. Alison Wiltz, article courtesy of medium.com

In America, some view diversity, equity, and inclusion as unnatural, likening them to an invasive species. Unwilling to concede the injustices in our society, some cast blame on Black people and other racial minorities for disparities. Some feel intimidated by seeing them fulfil roles traditionally reserved for White people. Others cling to racist stereotypes that suggest certain groups are less deserving of opportunities.

This belief system fuels backlash. During the run-up to the last presidential election, many Black people expressed concerns about Donald Trump's "Make America Great Again" slogan, wondering just how far back the current administration wants to take us.

Now, eight months into his second term, more Americans are starting to realize what Black people have been saying all along: that there would be harmful consequences to embracing anti-DEI.

Within three months, at least 300,000 Black women left the job market, many as a direct result of Trump's policies. As gender economist Katica Roy noted, "It's not a coincidence" that so many Black women have been given the boot lately. Jobs in the public sector, she said, have offered "a lifeline" for the Black women who've been "shut out of economic opportunity."

By securing government jobs, they sought to overcome the prejudice they traditionally faced; they comprised 12% of federal workers, double their representation in the private sector. Many believed these jobs were secure. However, given the Trump administration's policies, positions once considered reliable now stand on shaky ground.

For example, the "Department of Education and the Department of Health and Human Services" reduced job opportunities by half in some cases, according to Roy. While the goal of shrinking the federal workforce may seem race and gender neutral on the surface, many Black women have suffered economic loss.

And it's not like the private sector welcomed Black women who lost public sector jobs with open arms. Indeed, many major companies, such as Walmart, Lowe's, Target, Amazon, IBM, and Meta, have abandoned their DEI policies. This signals these companies are less likely to hire and retain Black women as employees. They made this shift while overlooking how Black people and women, in particular, continue to face discrimination in the workforce. A study published in the American Sociological Review found that résumés with white-sounding names "were 50 percent more likely than those with Black names" to receive call-backs, even when the Black candidate had better qualifications than their White counterpart. Findings from The CROWN Research Study revealed that Black women are three times as likely to say they've "been passed over for advancement because of [their] race." And 80% reported feeling they had to change their hair "from its natural state" to "fit in at the office." It's sad, but many "Black women fear scrutiny and discrimination when expressing their natural beauty." DEI programs were designed to address the discrimination Black people and other minorities endure. Sadly, many companies have followed the administration into the abyss, cancelling these programs and even positions held by Black women.

Black workers remain at an economic disadvantage compared to other groups. A McKinsey report found that 43% of Black private-sector workers earn less than $30,000 a year. No amount of hard work and persistence can make up for the fact that Black labor is undervalued by many white-owned businesses in this country.

Researchers identified significant challenges Black people face in the private sector: (1) Black workers are disproportionately represented in frontline jobs, which limits their opportunities for career advancement; (2) the attrition rate for Black employees is high, causing entry-level positions to become a revolving door; (3) "Black employees encounter a broken rung from entry-level jobs to managerial roles"; (4) there is a trust deficit between Black employees and the companies they work for; (5) they often lack sponsorship or allyship necessary for career advancement. The study's authors also provided evidence-backed strategies companies can use to address these racial disparities. Sadly, we live in a nation where policies and programs designed to address unfairness are ostracized.

The race and gender-based discrimination Black women endure didn't start with the Trump administration. Indeed, this country has a long history of targeting the group that can be traced back to chattel slavery. It's not by chance that Black women earn less than any other group in this country. This is, unfortunately, reflective of the prejudice directed at the group. Without a concerted effort by citizens, it's likely Black women will continue to face misogynoir. Compounding the problem, there's a hesitance for people to acknowledge their unique experience. It's like a cloak of invisibility that masks the layers of Black womanhood.

Either that, or many refuse to consider the nuance. Indeed, Billups et al. (2022) found "Black females seem to be perceived more neutrally, as if neither their gender nor their race is treated as predictive," of their treatment. This, in turn, makes it more difficult for Black women to find allies who are willing to address the injustices they endure. While these problems are entrenched in American life, the issues they face have become more pronounced. There seems to be a deliberate push to remove Black women from leadership positions and confine them to only low-level positions. Over a quarter of a million Black women lost their jobs following cuts to the federal workforce and anti-DEI purges in the public and private sectors. This means a significant number of Americans were impacted. However, since these citizens are Black women, the public response seems muted.

Part of the problem is that some wrongly assume Black people are undeserving of the opportunities they receive. This is evident in the systematic effort to remove them from leadership positions. For example, President Trump recently announced his intention to fire Lisa Cook, the nation's first Black woman to serve as Federal Reserve Governor. Without evidence, he's accused her of committing fraud. Some on the political right piled on with more criticism, claiming "Joe Biden's DEI pick" deserved to lose her position. A White woman named Sally, who supports the MAGA political movement, called Lisa Cook "hard-core DEI," whatever that means. One White man named Mark claimed she was an example of "why DEI is a failure and meritocracy is the only way forward." Their attack is part of a broader pattern of discrimination that Black women face in the workplace, especially those in higher positions. But the notion that Lisa Cook is unqualified is laughable to anyone familiar with her experience. Her background easily disproves their assumptions.

Donald Trump, the current president, has a B.A. degree from the University of Pennsylvania. Now, Lisa Cook, on the other hand, has a B.A. in philosophy from Spelman College and a PhD in Economics from the University of California, Berkeley. But this was only the beginning of her journey. Cook became a Marshall Scholar in 1986, earning a second B.A. in Philosophy, Politics, and Economics from the University of Oxford. So, if we're only judging academic credentials, she far outpaces the current president. It certainly wouldn't make sense for Trump or his followers to call her underqualified. Cook also has had an impressive career after attending college. She taught at Harvard University's Kennedy School of Government and became a tenured professor at Michigan State University. Additionally, she served as a senior economic advisor to President Obama, worked at the US Department of the Treasury, and became a senior advisor on finance and development in the government's Office of International Affairs. Then, as relevant to this discussion, Cook became Federal Reserve Governor in 2022, a position where she plays a significant role in shaping the nation's economic policy. Her 14-year term appointment lasts until January 2036.

In a bold move, Lisa Cook has chosen to remain in her position, despite risking the ire of the Trump administration and his most fervent followers. Her resistance is admirable, particularly in light of the latest anti-DEI purge, where Black women have suffered disproportionately. "Under the Federal Reserve Act, the only reason Federal Reserve governors can be removed from their position is 'for cause,' or some kind of wrongdoing," journalist Steve Kopack noted. Cook suggested Trump attempted to fire her despite not having cause to do so. As a result, she "will not resign." Instead, she plans to "continue to carry out [her] duties to help the American economy." Trump has grown accustomed to many caving to the public pressure he exerts. Yet, presenting accusations without evidence is not enough to remove Cook from her current position. This has some on the far-right stewing, angry that it's not easy to vanquish the latest Black woman they've targeted from her current position. Of course, this can't be an easy decision for her, given that she must work and report to an administration hostile to her leadership. However, it's a decision that aligns with existing legal precedent. As long as she performs her duties, she has no obligation to leave before her term is completed.

When we take a step back from this particular employment dispute, we see that Trump's attempt to remove Lisa Cook from her position is part of a broader anti-DEI movement. While some were initially unsure of their motivations, arguing that those on the political right only wanted to facilitate fairness in workplace affairs, it should be clear even to the most skeptical at this point, that anti-DEI, similar to antiwoke, is rooted in a racist worldview, that when implemented as policy aims to exclude Black people and other racial minorities from positions, regardless of their experience or accolades. Her experience is a painful reminder that no matter how many degrees a Black woman earns or how well she performs in her roles, there will always be some who assume she's undeserving of her accomplishments. This is an exhausting reality for those on the receiving end of race and gender-based discrimination, as there is no simple fix. But one thing is sure: we can't create a fair society by ignoring problems like racism, sexism, and other forms of discrimination, and certainly not by eliminating programs designed to help level the playing field.
